

THYSANIA AGRIPPINA (LEPIDOPTERA: NOCTUIDAE)

KURT B. GOHLA¹

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY, N. Y. 10458

Light grey moth, jungle bred,
 Giant of thy kind.
 How did a Master's hand
 Paint thee in modernistic forms
 Aeons before their time?
 Millions of tawny scales
 Arranged in zig-zag abandon
 Mold abstract designs upon thy parchment wings.
 Surrealistic dreams
 Which only art inspired man
 May urge upon a stiffened cloth.

In his letter he commented on the wing pattern of this moth as follows: "This giant of a moth is a living surrealistic painting of the latest type displayed at the Guggenheim Museum of Modern Art. It could put a Picasso to shame." This thought is here captured in verse.

The photograph of a specimen from his collection, approximately one-third actual size, was taken by Frank R. Borchardt, a student in the Fordham Modern Language Dept.

Shadowy creature!
Escaped from the depth of Hades,
Where Asphodels bloom in quiet profusion
Upon the dead and eery meadows
Giving you sustenance and life.—

Why didst thou escape
To haunt the fertile visions of man,
The spark divine
Gracing the human endeavor?
